Keymacro is a standalone utility that allows users to specify actions or keystrokes that will be associated with a hotkey (key combination). This hotkey can then be used to trigger the application with only a single press. Keymacro adds a useful and simple feature to any hotkey application that allows users to re-assign actions to that hotkey. Keymacro can be used to assign commonly used actions to hotkeys, even if you have a large keyboard and are not near the keyboard at the time of action. Installation: Unzip the Keymacro package and run the setup.exe file. You can use the default options provided or choose to use your own settings. Usage: To use Keymacro, press the hotkey you want to assign to a function. You can enter a new action for the hotkey or remove an action. Before removing the action, first check the keyboard shortcut for the application or the hotkey you are removing. To remove the default shortcut, search for "Keymacro" on your computer or on the web. There is no need to remove any of the actions you want to keep, they will not be lost. Keymacro takes a shortcut to add or remove hotkeys, you do not have to use the shortcut given here. Let us know what you think in the comments below!LONDON — The story of Donald Trump's surprise visit to Britain last weekend has become a little more familiar. The president was accompanied by his children, who walked through the same security cordon as other visitors. The British media took this to mean Trump's children were being considered as possible substitutes to serve as secretary of state. The U.S. president showed no interest in foreign policy, and left shortly after his visit, leaving the impression he was more interested in looking at the scenery than listening to the British government's reassurances that their relationship with the U.S. is strong. When asked to comment on whether he was surprised by Trump's lack of interest, a British official responded, "It is not a surprise to us." The message to the president? Don't expect much, and prepare to be disappointed. The British government's strategy is clear. Theresa May and her ministers want to project a strong image of their leadership, which is a clear contrast with Trump's campaign pledges that he would be "firm but fair" and take an "America First" approach to foreign policy. In fact, the "America First" policy is not even on Trump's list of campaign issues, so any pretense at working with a U.S. president that is less than enthused about multilateral organizations is likely to backfire. In a series of meetings with the British government on Tuesday, the most striking fact was the sheer determination of the British government to project a sense of strength and independence from the U.S. A senior European diplomat at the meetings described the atmosphere as "unusually tense," saying, "It was a very one-sided dialogue, where the British felt they had to impress the Americans." The Brits' plan, which focused on portraying a strong, independent Britain, was clear. But the details were scant — all the better to leave the impression of a strategy of a nation determined to go its own way. "Their leaders are
