Effects of the tyrosine kinase inhibitor genistein on mitogen-activated protein kinases and cAMP content in human myometrial cells. Genistein is a tyrosine kinase inhibitor that acts on cellular phosphotyrosine sites. It can modify mitogen-activated kinases (MAPK) in breast cancer cells; however, its effect on MAPK in myometrial cells is unknown. The purpose of this study was to examine the effects of genistein on MAPK, intracellular cAMP, and progesterone receptor (PR) expression in human myometrial cells. Myometrial cells from nonpregnant women were treated with genistein. The effect of genistein on mitogen-activated protein (MAP) kinase activity in protein kinase C (PKC)-deficient or -active myometrial cells was measured by Western blotting. Quantitative reverse transcriptase polymerase chain reaction (RT-PCR) and Western blotting were used to detect intracellular cAMP and PR, respectively. In PKC-deficient myometrial cells, MAPK activity was inhibited by genistein in a dose-dependent manner. Maximal inhibition was seen at 75 micromM. In PKC-active cells, genistein increased MAPK activity by 30 to 40%. Treatment with genistein also increased cAMP in myometrial cells; however, it increased PR expression in myometrial cells only in cells with PKC. Genistein can inhibit MAPK activity in human myometrial cells. Stimulation of myometrial MAPK and inhibition of cAMP in myometrial cells caused by genistein may be attributed to an increased PKC activity.
